Atlanta Airport thankful for GDOT assistance

The Hartsfield-Jackson Atlanta International Airport is a self-sustaining organization when it comes to generating revenue, but they rely on partnerships in order to complete their projects. Georgia Department of Transportation (GDOT) has partnered up with the airport to help them with their current project.

Louis Miller, aviation general manager, Atlanta International Airport, attended this month's Transportation Board meeting to update the Board on information about the airport and to express his appreciation to the GDOT for their support in the expansion of their international terminal.

The Atlanta airport is preparing to open an international terminal with "a new front door for international passengers." The terminal is expected to open in the spring of 2012. The new I-75 access point to the terminal will require a large signage project to ensure motorists are aware of the changes. Georgia DOT will be helping to put a total of 113 new signs at 100 locations.

The two agencies will be working closely with one another to make sure the signs are posted at the appropriate time. The assistance of Georgia DOT has been very important in helping the airport make a smooth transition, according to Miller. The Department's help has had an impact on the airport and the community.

While projects such as the international terminal will help the airport operate more efficiently, the anticipated expansion has also been essential in bringing businesses to the area.

"Companies are citing the airport as the number one reason for relocating to Atlanta," Miller said.

Miller informed Board members that Reliance Worldwide Corps and Health Lean Logistics are relocating their headquarters' to Atlanta from Australia and Spain respectively. Porsche is also relocating its North American headquarters next to the airport. The three companies will bring more than 200 jobs to the area.

The results from the partnership between the airport and the Department were very encouraging to Board members. The Board expressed an eager readiness to continue building the relationship.

Although the airport doesn't rely on taxpayer funding, its leadership recognizes the importance of working with public servant agencies, such as GDOT, to meet its private sector needs.
